Very Important	Important	Important	Time is the biggest constraint of all. So much of my time is being siphoned off into non-research tasks (compliance, instruction, service) that it is hard to find sufficient time to devote to proposal writing, even for opportunities that I know are good matches for my program. Trying to identify new funding streams, and determining what new funders want to see in a proposal, falls low on the priority list when we are constantly bombarded with urgent tasks not related to research and development.	The biggest help possible, particularly for newer faculty, would be to have the college provide support to hire a grant writer. Having someone specifically trying to match faculty to granting opportunities (with a personal approach, rather than blanket emails) would also help.	Very Important	Unimportant

Overall, targeted, one-on-one assistance will be much more helpful than databases. Lists of potential diversity initiatives, while easy to assemble, won't help much. Having a knowledgable person suggest a specific program that is a great match, and who then facilitates an introduction to the program director in question, would be of much more help. Access to grant writers (paid for by the university) would be an enormous help. See previous comments. We are not prepared, institutionally, for large collaborative proposal development. Most OSU PIs are probably unaware of the range of services provided to PIs by the major institutions and national laboratories, encapsulating each major proposal with a team of knowledgable administra-tive and technical support. It takes a large team to compete for proposals above $10M. Only the RCRV Proposal has, to my knowledge, been handled in this way, and it shows how successful this approach is. 	Very Important	Very Important	Very Important	Very Important	Very Important	Very Important	Our College has no support for these activities and, as far as I can tell, OSU has little support for these activities. We need these supports to meet (often legal) obligations and stay R1 relevant. NOT having these supports has led me to more often accept Co-I status (as opposed to PI status), deferring to colleagues at better supported universities in these regards. This is very unfortunate. I want to remain at OSU and keep growing our College research, but often consider a bid to move to another institution that can better support a faculty member with my externally funded research record and capacities. I know others in my College wrestle with this as well.

the problems with research compliance and ethics are not in the area of proposal devel-opment (although they are problematic at every level). The problems with research compliance and ethics are most problematic after a grant is awarded. Then the OSU IRB and research compliance create major barriers to com-pleting the goals of funded projects. It has been one of the main reasons I have seriously considered leaving OSU (with many millions of dollars in grant money). It is too difficult to do research at OSU, deal with the research office and with IRB. I know other faculty who have left and know faculty who routine-ly try to have grants go through other universities because of the issues of dealing with OSU's IRB office. OSU has lost a lot of money in indirect costs because of this.	Very Important	Very Important	Very Important	Very Important	Very Important	Very Important	all of them. I've never been at an institution where researchers were unable to see the OLAW assurance document. How do you write ACUPs with no guidance? As the system currently exists, you write an ACUP and it is sent back with comments that you can't perform a procedure a certain way rather than telling researchers up front what types of procedures are approved. And it takes far too long to get approval in the first place. IACUC compliance information from the Research Office is often wrong, and responses to noncompliance issues are completely out of line, at least according to the funding agencies. And after the dust settles and PIs have spent numerous stressful hours to fix problems caused by the IACUC compliance office, everyone in the Research Office congratulates each other on a job well done! It's bizarre that spending isn't more up-to-date in a computerized world. Sometimes it takes weeks to see changes in budgets, not simply for purchases but also in personnel re-budgeting.	Important	Unimportant	Unimportant	I do this myself. Faster. With an NIH grant I have to do this anyway.	none

there is insufficient communication between our office management and COS business office to administer grants. I often have to contact the business office myself to get things accomplished (or corrected..).	Unimportant	Unimportant	Unimportant	none

Reconciling OSU's poor financial reporting on grants and the difficulty on finding information and FRR reports that are usually in error.	Important	Important	Unimportant	For training grants and Center grants, OSUs reports are useless in my opinion. We do google searches.	Patents and commercialization should be considered here.

My colleagues and I have learned to avoid sub-awards, whenever possible, due to the lack of adequate support. It is next to impossible to know how much money you have when the budget tracking is never up to date and there is no flexibility regarding the difference between fiscal years with OSU and NIH, for example.	Very Important	Very Important	Very Important	Tracking publications and citations support is lacking. I have to track all of that myself.

	Unimportant	Very Important	Important		It would be helpful to have a link or informa-tion about submitting to ScholarsArchive@OSU. ScholarsArchive also provides a service for NIH and DOE-funded researchers to comply with funding through ScholarsArchive. Links to that information during the process would be very helpful.
	Important	Very Important	Very Important		hopefully you are looking to collaborate with other units on this (specifically OSU Libraries)
